More than 400 local journalism jobs have been lost in the UK over the last 17 months, according to a new report into the state of the local news industry.

The report, launched yesterday at the Houses of Parliament, was commissioned by the National Union of Journalists and compiled using Press Gazette reports and other sources.

A majority of the job losses reported were made by regional publisher Newsquest (139) with rivals Trinity Mirror and Johnston Press both making about 100 journalists redundant over the period.

I am thrilled to announce the launch of the Bureau Local, a project aiming to spark a new wave of data-driven investigative reporting at a regional level.

Our newly-appointed team, based at the Bureau of Investigative Journalism, will build a network of regional reporters and tech experts across the country to investigate large-scale datasets and uncover local public interest stories.

We combine years of experience in local reporting with award-winning data journalism and development skills. We've left our jobs at The Times, Trinity Mirror, Greenpeace Investigations and the Croydon Advertiser because we want

New voters' power to swing election

www.birminghammail.com

A sharp increase in newly registered voters in Birmingham and Edgbaston – one of the most marginal seats in the country – has the power to swing the general election.

Almost 1,000 new voters have registered in Birmingham and Edgbaston in the last year – in a key seat where Labour lost the Conservatives by just 1,138 votes in 2015.

In its historic 45 women MPs, Labour's parliamentary candidate Philip Shingler is hoping to get the seat from Conservative candidate Claire Louise Leyland and Liberal Democrat, Kirsty Allan.

The party was 1,000 votes in the constituency in 2015, which is more than enough to decide the outcome of such a marginal seat – and could work to the favour of either the Conservatives or Labour.

Green parliamentary candidate John Mawhood will stand, which could also be a deciding factor for the election, as the party won 2,387 votes in 2015 in the constituency.
